INTRODUCTION

UNTIL the late Mr. William S. Baker, in 1875, published his "American Engravers and Their Works," the existence of engravers upon copper in the American Colonies and States seems to have been persistently ignored by writers upon this branch of art. Volumes have been printed upon the engravers of Europe and of England, and the life and work of some of the most obscure among foreign engravers have been duly recorded; but the authors of these books fail to note that engraving upon metal was practiced in the American Colonies fully two hundred and fifty years ago; and that the work of some of the later American engravers in line is only surpassed by a few among the foreign master-engravers. But, we must also admit that it is only within a comparatively recent period that Americans themselves have commenced to collect and to take an intelligent interest in the early engraved work of their own countrymen.

So far as the earlier American prints are concerned there is sufficient ground for the seeming neglect of foreign writers upon engraving. During the Colonial and Revolutionary periods of our history the demand for copperplate engraving of any kind was so limited that there was no room here for the professional copperplate engraver; and the occasional plates that did appear were engraved by the local silver and goldsmith as a part of their regular trade. The impressions from these plates had a very limited circulation, and rarely—if ever, found their way across the Atlantic. They were thus unknown to the foreign collectors and writers.

In America—as in Europe, engraving upon wood preceded work upon copper; and very crudely engraved seals and other simple wood-cuts appear soon after the introduction of the printing-press into the American Colonies. The first woodcut portrait of which we have any record is that of the Rev. Richard Mather, credited to John Foster as the engraver and appearing in a life of Mather published by Foster, in Cambridge, New England, in 1670. During the eighteenth century wood-engraving was practically only used in this country on the title-pages of almanacs and in the headings of and in advertising illustrations in the newspapers of the day; and the few examples thus preserved are usually atrocious in execution.

The first definite date that can be assigned to engraving upon metal for purposes of reproduction—in the American Colonies, is 1652, when Joseph Jenckes, of Lynn, Colony of Massachusetts Bay, cut the dies for the Pine-tree shilling issued in that year. But it was not until 1690, when Massachusetts was compelled to resort to an issue of paper money, that the first actual demand arose for the work of the engraver upon a copperplate. England was seemingly too remote to provide these plates in the time required; and in this emergency the Colonial authorities availed themselves of the services of some silversmith of Boston who had obtained his training in engraving arms, script and decoration upon silver plate. As John Conny, a reputable gold and silversmith of Boston, is known to have made the plates for the Massachusetts money of 1702, it is probable that he engraved the plates for the earlier issue as well; and with this assumption, John Conny would be the first American engraver upon copper of whom we have any knowledge.

The evolution of copperplate engraving in the American Colonies and States can be briefly sketched. Before the Revolution the local engraved work included little more than book-plates, bill-heads, engraved music-books, some maps, a few views of colleges and churches and an occasional portrait of a clergyman or Colonial governor. In 1701, Thomas Emmes, of Boston, made the first recorded attempt at engraving a portrait on copper, that of the Rev. Increase Mather; and this plate was a scratched rather than engraved copy of an English original. The first really meritorious portrait made here was that of the Rev. Cotton Mather, painted and engraved in Boston by Peter Pelham in 1727. Pelham was a mezzotint engraver who had done much very good work in London before he came to Boston, and he was the first professional copperplate engraver who worked in this country. Prior to 1775, the better-known copperplate engravers in the American Colonies—in addition to the men named, were Johnston, Turner, Hurd, Dawkins, Revere, Callender, Smither and Norman. With hardly an exception these men were silversmiths, and they engraved on copper as a part of their general business. During and after the Revolution, the portraits of statesmen and generals, battle-scenes and maps of the "seat of war" became popular; and here we have the work of Okey, Doolittle, Romans, Norman, Aitken and a few others.

After the establishment of peace in the United States, there was some promotion of literature and the arts. Many standard English works were reprinted; Dobson, of Philadelphia, republished Rees' voluminous encyclopaedia, and illustrated magazines were started in the chief cities. These books were largely illustrated and there soon arose a demand for skilled copperplate engravers. Under the incentive of abundant and profitable work, trained engravers now came from England, men like Edwin, Houston and Haines; and American-born engravers—Peale, Savage and Tiebout, becoming ambitious of doing better work, studied engraving in London under competent masters. The good engravers thus established in the United States soon gathered pupils about them and the number of skilled engravers in this country rapidly increased after 1800.
INTRODUCTION

Line-engraving in the United States received a decided impulse when Jacob Perkins, in 1810, substituted steel for copper in the plates used for banknotes. The steel permitted much finer work and at the same time vastly prolonged the life of the plate. Paper money was then abundant in the States and banknote engraving companies sprang into being in all our large cities. The high grade of work demanded in engraving the vignettes and script, the regular employment and the relatively good pay offered by these companies attracted the best engravers in the country and encouraged others to perfect themselves in line-work. A school of excellent line-engravers was rapidly developed, and these men and their successors established the lasting reputation of American banknote engraving throughout the world. Nearly all of the good American engravers of the first half of the last century, at some time in their career, were interested in banknote engraving; and it is sufficient to note among them such men as Leney, Rollinson, Tiebout, Peter Maverick and the master American line-engraver—A. B. Durand.

With the last quarter of the last century came the practical end of all hand engraving upon copper and upon steel for purposes of general illustration. In 1878, Ives invented the half-tone, photo-engraving process; and this process was quickly perfected and almost at once became popular. It had so many advantages over the slow and costly handwork on copper, that copperplate engraving as practiced for about four centuries became commercially impossible. The process-work was very rapid in execution; it was comparatively very cheap; it admitted of direct reproduction from natural scenery or objects; and, above all, the resultant plate could be printed with type-matter, making no longer necessary the separate printing on the plate-press and the separate handling of the impressions. In the somewhat more expensive form of photogravure the commercial advantage still largely remained with the process. Hand work on steel and on copper is still employed by the banknote engraving establishments; simply because, the necessary training and skill and the great cost are factors in preventing imitation.

But the art of engraving on copper is dead—the true engraver is rapidly disappearing, leaving no successors. The art itself lives in its traditions and in the plates of the masters; those men whose work must always command our admiration for their consummate skill in the handling of the burin, for their color values, their wonderful modelling and their deep artistic feeling.

NOTE

The dimensions of the prints described in this catalogue are expressed in inches and sixteenths of inches, written "decimally." Thus $7.15 \times 6.3$ ins. is equivalent to $7\frac{15}{16} \times 6\frac{3}{16}$ ins. The dimensions noted only include the extreme limits of the enclosing rectangle or oval; or the outer lines of a vignette. In no case is the inscription included. The vertical height is first given, then the width.

In the brief biographies preceding the descriptions only the year of birth and death is given; and when only one date is shown it is that of the earliest known work of the engraver. For further details of these biographies reference is made to "American Engravers on Copper and Steel," lately published by the Grolier Club; and the numbers in brackets at the end of the descriptions refer to the check-list numbers in that work. The blank brackets denote prints too late in date to be noted in the check-list referred to; or, those not coming within the scope of that list.

The space available only permits the exhibition of examples of the earlier engravers and prints of a few of the best-known among the later engravers.

Contractions: Vign.—vignette; rect.—rectangle; orna—a—ornamental frame, or frame with accessories; ins.—inscription.
